September 11, 1895.

Dear James:-

Your letter received and I inclose herewith thirty dollars, as requested, which you will please acknowledge when you receive it. It is now half past twelve o'clock and this is the first line I have had a chance to write this morning; some one in the office all the time.

We are all quite well, and I have nothing of interest to write. The baby is as sweet and smart as he can be, and I have never seen one to whom every body who knows him is more attached. He seems to be as well as he could be and full of fun all the time.

Marg has started and as she was admitted into the seventh grade I suppose she will be satisfied. She protested against going back to the graded school if she was required to remain in the sixth grade. She seems somewhat interested in her lessons and I hope she will get along well. She does not look very well and I am afraid she will be sick again, for we cannot rely upon her to take medicine until she gets down so she is compelled to.

I am glad to learn you are all as well as you are, and hope you will continue so. I am too busy to write more.

With love to all, I am

Your loving Uncle,

*Miss Susan C. Foxworth
Linda, Miss.*

J. M. Stow.
